Check out our best Minecraft server services now In the end, the cuts only deepened the political divide among Americans, who see Washington as more of a special-interest town than an engine of change. And many young Americans are asking themselves a new, more nuanced question: not "What do I want to be when I grow up?" but "How can I get there?" This is what some House Democrats are calling "middle America." The phrase is meant to suggest that the Democratic Party needs to recover its connection to the nation's heartland. "We have to recognize our strength comes from the small town, the middle-income family, the person who runs the small business," said Rep. Steve Cohen of Tennessee, the Democratic Caucus chairman. "I have to look to my fellow Americans to understand why they feel disenfranchised." Younger voters, in particular, were more likely to tell Gallup that they were more engaged in politics than older voters, suggesting that they're striving to adapt their political identities to current day life. And when the question of citizenship was put to voters in Gallup's standard political ideology questions, it turned out that younger people had a stronger sense of their country as a "nation of immigrants." Sixty percent of voters between 18 and 29 said that Americans were a "nation of immigrants," while fewer older people, who had been born in the U.S., agreed. And on a related note, "nonpartisan" organizations that attempt to find common ground between the left and the right, such as MoveOn.org and the Tea Party, which place an emphasis on middle-class problems, are struggling to define their place in the emerging political landscape. "A lot of the things that I talk about have to do with the middle class," said Micah Sifry, editor and publisher of the Washington, D.C.-based progressive news site TechPresident, which has focused largely on technology issues. "That doesn't mean that's where Democrats should abandon liberals and where Republicans should abandon conservatives. It means that the middle has to be the center of this." While Democrats may be unpopular in some parts of the country, they are broadly held in high regard by younger voters and those with higher levels of education, according to recent Gallup surveys. This is especially true among Democrats. Forty-five percent of Democrats agreed that "the Democratic Party is the party of the American people." But among Republicans, only 27 percent agreed that
